SYNOPSIS

The film tells of land surveyors, self-surveyors, bacteria collection and locality research. It gives insight into the behaviour of German drivers leaving their parking spaces and demonstrates that the shells of tortoises in fact represent the innermost order of the world. Apparently normal citizens at home getting high on weird and self developed statistics, or trying to get a handle on the orderly nature of their bodily functions by means of complicated autoexperiments; researchers using systems of the most varied kinds to vainly struggle against the boundless character of their specialist topic; dubious bureaucratic planning fantasies: is orderliness really only half of existence?
